Indians and Emigrants: Encounters on the Overland Trails ...

Cross-cultural encounters took many forms on America's overland trails during the mid-nineteenth century. Overwhelmingly, the meetings were peaceful and helpful rather than hostile. The bartering of goods, usually moccasins, bison robes, and food in exchange for cotton or woolen shirts and jewelry, was a common occurrence between the natives and the Americans.

Indians and Emigrants: Encounters on the Overland Trails ...

In 1979, scholars of the overland trail migration in the mid-nineteenth-century United States were treated to the meticulous posthumous publication of The Plains Across: The Overland Emigrants and the Transmississippi West, 1840-1860 by John D. Unruh, Jr. Since then, other historians have expanded on several themes touched on by Unruh, including women's experiences of trail life, gender roles, family life, U.S. Army forts along the various trails, and Indian-white interactions, among others.

Indians and Emigrants: Encounters on the Overland Trails ...

Book Review by Bob Reece, April 2006. Movie scene 1956 -- Pioneers in covered wagons observe Indians on horseback upon a ridge. The white women and children start to panic as the men quickly move the wagons into a defensive circle. Children are hidden under bedding inside the wagons; men scramble to hurry the horses within the circle while mounted warriors dressed in war paint move down the hillside.
